American Health Lawyers Association Names Husch Blackwell's Angela Quinn to 2012 Leadership Development Program

Husch Blackwell Partner Angela Quinn was selected to join the 2012 Leadership Development Program of the American Health Lawyers Association's Liability and Litigation practice group. The program provides group members the opportunity to observe, interact and participate on projects with current practice group leaders in order to become more effective AHLA participants and future AHLA leaders.

AHLA's Liability and Litigation practice group addresses all areas of potential liability that affect healthcare providers, suppliers and manufacturers. Members are kept informed on developments in the litigation and trial of pertinent healthcare disputes. AHLA is the nation's largest nonpartisan, nonprofit, educational organization committed to "lead health law to excellence through education, information and dialogue."

A Litigation attorney in the firm's St. Louis, Mo., office, Quinn regularly represents corporate healthcare clients and individual healthcare providers in a broad range of litigation involving licensing and regulatory issues, compliance and professional malpractice, and business and commercial disputes. She represents healthcare clients before state and federal courts, in administrative proceedings, and before arbitration panels and state licensing boards. In addition, Quinn has extensive experience defending physicians and other healthcare providers in personal injury and wrongful death claims.
