OVERVIEW

Kathryn focuses on healthcare regulatory law, leveraging a unique blend of military and medical experience.

Kathryn previously served as an emergency action controller and aerospace medical technician in the U.S. Air Force, roles that honed her ability to handle complex, high-pressure situations. Her interest in law grew out of her military service: she had enjoyed delving into Air Force regulations and using them to argue for and against policy decisions, which naturally led her to the legal field.

Thanks to her medical background, including a master's in healthcare administration and work as a military EMT/nurse, the healthcare regulatory practice area was also a natural fit. Kathryn's own healthcare career had become more and more administratively focused as she advanced in the Air Force, giving her a solid understanding of the complexity of healthcare operations—and the inherent challenge of operating in compliance with ever-changing regulations.

Known for meticulous attention to detail and a confident, patient approach, Kathryn excels in communication and leadership. Her ability to adapt and persevere in challenging situations makes her a reliable and effective advocate for clients navigating the intricate landscape of healthcare law.
