OVERVIEW

Ryan leverages his unique experience and understanding of employment law to best counsel clients at each stage of litigation.

Ryan represents employers, management, and business owners in a wide variety of labor and employment cases, including both class action and single plaintiff litigation. While he currently focuses much of his practice on clients throughout the country in the technology, manufacturing, and transportation industries, he has worked with clients across a diverse range of fields. Ryan has experience with matters involving allegations of discrimination and retaliation, workplace harassment, wage and hour disputes, USERRA compliance and alleged violations, whistleblower claims, and ADA disputes, as well as noncompete and restrictive covenant litigation. He also has extensive experience defending clients in federal and state governmental agency matters, including investigations by the U.S. Department of Labor, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, and their state counterpart agencies.

Alongside his work in the courtroom, Ryan also conducts workplace investigations, and he regularly provides advice to help clients achieve productive and compliant workplaces. His litigation experience means he can readily spot potential issues before disputes arise.

Prior to earning his J.D., Ryan accepted a role as a paralegal with an international law firm's labor and employment team. He quickly realized that law was the right field for him and went on to enroll in law school with the plan of remaining in the labor and employment practice area. Ryan continued working as a paralegal while
