OVERVIEW

Peter handles corporate transactions, supporting clients with contract drafting, research, and transactional matters across a range of industries.

Peter values the opportunity to help others by focusing on practical solutions. He was drawn to corporate transactional work through his concentration in Health Law and Bioethics, where he saw how legal and ethical considerations intersect in business. He appreciates working with teams to address complex legal questions and support business objectives.

As a law student, Peter served as a research assistant for a professor specializing in law, medicine, and public policy, and he completed a one-year externship with a public healthcare company. These experiences gave him insight into academic and business perspectives. He was also an editor for a law journal and authored publications on emerging biotechnology.

Before law school, Peter worked as a paralegal, supporting people with injuries and disabilities in administrative law. This role taught him to keep client goals in focus, especially on long-term projects. As a summer associate at Husch Blackwell, he worked on a wide range of matters with the corporate team, including assisting with legal research, contract drafting, and participating in meetings with clients.

Peter is known as available, focused, and efficient in supporting both the team and clients. He is committed to clear communication and practical results.
